AMS ANNOUNCES NEW PARTNERSHIPS WITH FELLOW SCIENTIFIC SOCIETIES

January 7, 2015 – The American Meteorological Society (AMS) today announced two new partner agreements with meteorological societies of other countries to promote greater dialogue and collaboration with others working in the atmospheric, oceanic, and hydrologic sciences. The agreements, signed recently with the Canadian Meteorological and Oceanographic Society (CMOS) and the Indian Meteorological Society (IMS), were announced at the 95th AMS Annual Meeting being held this week in Phoenix, Arizona.

"We are excited to form these new partnerships as we look ahead to future opportunities that allow us to create a larger, global resource for the weather, water, and climate community," said William Gail, 2014 AMS President. "Providing reciprocal membership benefits with our new partners allows professionals working internationally in various disciplines of the enterprise to access important scientific and professional information from these other societies."

The new partnerships include discounts for each society's members to join AMS, as well as for AMS members to join CMOS and IMS.

For more about reciprocal membership opportunities, visit the AMS website at http://www2.ametsoc.org/ams/index.cfm/membership/ams-member-resources/